I've recently started talking to someone who lives in another country, and although we get along really well, I'm wondering how realistic a long-distance relationship actually is. For people who have been through this, what helped you maintain trust, communication, and emotional closeness despite the distance?

Long-distance relationships can definitely work, but they require more trust, patience, and communication than many traditional relationships. From what I've seen, couples who succeed usually create routines, share everyday moments, and make clear plans for spending time together in the future. Distance becomes easier when both people feel included in each other's lives and make a real effort to stay connected. I found <https://dilmil.co/st...-keep-the-love-alive> useful because it includes practical advice about maintaining emotional closeness and building stronger long-distance relationships despite physical separation.
